BUILDINGS AND MORE

Signs of Growth are All Across Campus

The tremendous growth at CSUS during the last decade promises to continue as this new decade gets underway, a fact that should be difficult to miss this year.

Two new buildings are opening on campus, as well as a new plaza and the historic Julia Morgan House. And a series of buildings and other additions are planned for the next few years.

It's enough to guarantee another generation of alumni will be uttering the oft heard: "This place has sure changed since I was here."

Making debuts this year are the new Steven Lee Yamshon Alumni Center, located near Hornet Stadium, and Mariposa Hall, a five-story classroom building. There's a new plaza honoring Joe Serna Jr., the late CSUS professor and mayor of Sacramento, and renovations are complete on the University's Julia Morgan House at 3731 T St.

There's also a new state-of-the-art track and field complex, where the highly successful 2000 U.S. Olympic Track and Field Trials were held. The facility is now in demand for many other major events, and has become a recruiting boon for the CSUS track and field team.

And waiting in the wings is a new collection of buildings on the south side of campus near the freeway, a new parking structure and a high-tech addition to the University Library.

The $2.2 million Steven Lee Yamshon Alumni Center is the realization of a long-held dream of the CSUS Alumni Association – a place on campus for alumni to gather, meet with current students and help promote the University. It includes room for gatherings of up to 600 people, two large patios and a catering kitchen, and can be used for meetings, conferences, art exhibits, award ceremonies and other special events. It also houses office space for alumni relations staff.

A series of events celebrating the opening of the Alumni Center is scheduled to coincide with Homecoming week, Oct. 8-14. Events will include a fun run, a series of forums, the Alumni Honors Luncheon and a pre-game party. More information is available at 278-6295.

The $12 million Mariposa Hall opens for classes this semester. It provides the first permanent quarters and specialized lab space for the department of design. It also houses the department of family and consumer sciences, the department of foreign languages, the division of social work and offices of the dean of the College of Arts and Letters.

This year's faculty and staff reception will be held at Mariposa Hall at 5:30 p.m., Friday, Sept. 15. A building dedication is scheduled immediately before the reception.

MORE SPACE –

The five-story Mariposa Hall opens this semester, and will house programs in design, family and consumer sciences, foreign languages and social work, as well as offices of the dean of the College of Arts and Letters. To celebrate its opening, this year's faculty and staff reception will be held at the new building at 5:30 p.m., Friday, Sept. 15. A building dedication is scheduled immediately before the reception.

Two Colleges Have New Deans

A new dean and an interim dean have been appointed by CSUS President Donald R. Gerth.

Catherine Emihovich, formerly a professor of counseling and educational psychology at the University at Buffalo in New York, is the new dean of the College of Education. Her appointment follows a national search.

And Marilyn Hopkins, the associate dean of the College of Health and Human Services, has been named the interim dean of that College.

At the University at Buffalo, Emihovich served as the director for the Buffalo Research Institute on Education for Testing. Her major research interests include children's language use in classrooms and peer relations; sociolinguistic studies of discourse in community and educational settings; relationships among cognition, language, and literacy; and race, class, and gender equity in education. Her teaching interests center on child and adolescent development; classroom applications of educational psychology; cultural psychology; and educational ethnography.

"Dr. Emihovich is well prepared for this senior administrative position," said President Gerth. "I look forward to working with her as she assumes this leadership role."

Emihovich earned a bachelor's degree in speech and drama from Syracuse University. Her master's degree is in measurement and statistics and her doctorate degree is in educational psychology. She earned both at SUNY, Buffalo.

Hopkins was appointed interim dean of the College of Health and Human Services following a campuswide recruitment effort. She was formerly the associate dean of the College of Health and Human

New 'Hornet Welcome' For Incoming Students

Going to college is the start of a new life for many students, particularly first-time freshmen.

To help these new students adjust, CSUS expanded its orientation to include the first-ever "Hornet Welcome" last week. Hundreds of students participated.

Hornet Welcome included a new student convocation led by top administrators and faculty in full academic regalia. President Gerth talked to the students about the importance of higher education and gave an overview of CSUS and its traditions.

Hornet Welcome also included an on-campus job fair, informative workshops and social activities that gave students a chance to mingle with other students, faculty and staff.

Students learned about time management, personal finance, campus safety and campus activities.

"We are hoping to provide new students with opportunities to gain information about how to successfully navigate their first year at Sac State," says Heather Dunn Carlton, assistant director of student activities.

The free orientation program not only provided students with information about the University – it also focused on the city of Sacramento.

Newcomers learned how to get around town and were given tours of Sacramento, including stops in Old Sacramento and at the Downtown Plaza. There was also a vendor fair featuring samples and information from local merchants and eateries.

First Doctorate Student

From Sutter's Fort manuscripts to national forests and old buildings at Air Force bases, David Byrd's life work has been practicing public history.

Now, the CSUS alumnus is set to make a bit of history himself.

Returning this fall for another degree here, Byrd will become the University's first doctorate student. He has enrolled in the University's new public history doctorate program, a joint program created last year with UC Santa Barbara.

"I believe in the public history program, and doing this new thing will be exciting," Byrd says. "I feel like finishing this Ph.D. will offer me even more opportunities in the field, and I'll be better able to help train the next generation of public historians."

Byrd's enrollment is a momentous occasion for the University.

And for Byrd, it will be more than simply embarking on his toughest educational challenge. He'll be joining the ranks of another history student, John J. Collins, who graduated alone to become the University's first alumnus in 1948.

Like Collins, Byrd's name will be the answer in campus trivia games.

"It does feel sort of strange, I guess, when you put it that way," Byrd says.

Technically speaking, Byrd is one of two students to enroll in the new doctorate program.

But Kathryn Wollan, whose interest is historic preservation, will be attending classes at UC Santa Barbara this year and will fulfill her required year of residency at CSUS later.

The creation of the joint doctorate program with UC Santa Barbara last year follows years of effort by faculty from both universities.

It combines the already strong public history program at CSUS, with its perfect location in

David Byrd

California's Capital and the heart of Gold Country, with a program at UC Santa Barbara that is generally regarded as the first university to offer a degree in public history.

The joint program is one of just 10 public history doctorate programs in the country.

It is also the first and only doctorate program at CSUS. CSU campuses only offer doctorate degrees in partnership with another university, and just four of the 23 CSU campuses currently do so.

Byrd has watched as the public history program matured at CSUS.

He earned his bachelor's degree in history in 1988, and later a master's degree in public history here. Like so many other history students, he decided to attend CSUS because of its location – specifically, its proximity to the State Library and State Archives.

He has since kept in contact with professors like Chris Castaneda, who now directs the public history program, and recently retired professor Ken Owens, who founded the program.

"Dave Byrd is a great person to have as our first Ph.D. student in public history," says Castaneda. "He really exemplifies the kind of student we hope to attract to our program."

Byrd first became interested in pursuing a career in public history while taking a course on the subject taught by Owens, where he realized he could do more with a history degree than teach.

During Byrd's final semester, he interned at Sutter's Fort in Sacramento, where he worked on a project involving Donner Party papers. That was what hooked him on public history.

Byrd was sidetracked by a stint in the U.S. Air Force Reserves that led to his being called into active duty during the Gulf War (he served in Europe).

Two years after completing his undergraduate work, Byrd returned to CSUS to earn a master's degree in public history. As a graduate student, he had a new internship almost every semester, getting a broad range of experience. His master's thesis was an exhibit at Sutter's Fort on explorer John Fremont and the American-Mexican War. The exhibition remained in place and open to the public for five years.

Byrd then worked more than five years with JRP Historical Consulting Services, which offers legal support, water rights, cultural resource management and other research. Much of his time was spent at military bases that faced closure, determining which buildings should be saved because of historical value. This year he returned to Sutter's Fort where he is currently employed as a historian and interpretive specialist. He is also currently the president of the California Council for the Promotion of History (CCPH), a statewide organization for public historians.

After completing his doctorate degree, Byrd says, he would like to manage a historical site or establish his own consulting firm to work with museums.

Alumnus Featured in College Promotion Video

CSUS alumnus Dan Hansen had an audience of a few thousand for his spring 2000 commencement speech to fellow graduates of the College of Arts and Letters.

But many more thousands will soon be getting his message, thanks to a new video called College: Making it Happen.

Hansen, who has Duchenne muscular dystrophy, brought the CSUS commencement crowd to their feet with his inspirational life story and speech. His condition severely limits his mobility and requires him to use a respirator to breathe.

"I had always thought that when I graduated, wouldn't it be something to talk to everyone about what I'd been through," Hansen says.

When the 28-year-old communication studies major mentioned his dream to department chair Val Smith, Hansen found out the two were on the same wavelength. "He said he had thought he'd have me speak all along," Hansen says.

While in high school, Hansen had to make a crucial decision that could have derailed his college aspirations. The progression of the disease had severely hampered his breathing, leaving him a life or death decision to go on permanent respirator support. Though the respirator would keep him alive, medical experts couldn't promise that he would be able to continue to go to school.

Not only did he continue, he went on to graduate from high school, earn an associate's degree from American River College and complete his bachelor's degree at CSUS. He hopes the next step will be to add a master's degree.

Hansen, who has also written and published his autobiography Let the Flame Within Burn Brighter, says the reason he talks about his experiences – both struggles and successes – is to give people a better understanding of what it's like to have a disability. He also wants to be a role model for others.

"I want to give hope and inspiration to people with disabilities," he says.

And inspiration is exactly what College: Making It Happen is all about. The video was produced by Joyce Mitchell, a part-time CSUS professor and freelance producer, and directed by Ted Ross of Ross-Campbell, Inc. They hope sharing Hansen's story in the video will motivate prospective college students throughout the state.

"Just the first time I talked to him, I found him very inspirational," says Mitchell, who met Hansen when he was still a student in communication studies. "I knew he would be perfect for this video."

The half-hour video targets middle and high school students and their parents, and was produced for the California Student Aid Commission and EDFUND. It features a half-dozen inspirational stories, from Hansen to a family with 11 children who all graduated from college.

The video is hosted by actor and producer Edward James Olmos.

Mitchell wrote and produced the video, one of a series of similar projects for her. She previously produced a video called The Power of Education. That video aired on public television stations across the country and won a first place Silver Telly Award, which is a national award of excellence given to non-commercial programs. She has also produced videos on repaying student loans, among other projects.

The latest video will be distributed in both English and Spanish.

Study Looks at Campus Paths

The Roseville office of Fehr & Peers Associates has been awarded a $21,000 contract to evaluate the University's pedestrian and bicycle routes, and to recommend improvements.

The University has also built a new walkway from Hornet Crossing north to the Sinclair Avenue. That project was needed immediately because of anticipated foot traffic from Hornet Crossing, a new railroad undercrossing from Elvas Ave. to the campus.

The study is funded by a grant from the U.S. Department of Transportation, and will help in the University's ongoing effort to safely balance the needs of pedestrian, bicycle and automobile traffic. Results are expected by the end of November. Sacramento City Councilmember Steve Cohn and the staff of the city planning department supported the grant proposal.

Completion of Hornet Crossing, the most convenient western access to campus, prompted the study. The undercrossing is expected to increase the use of the 65th Street light rail station significantly this semester.

Robert Jones, CSUS vice president for university affairs, said the University is pleased with Hornet Crossing. "Its use by students, faculty and campus visitors will contribute to the University's strong commitment to provide alternatives to personal automobiles to access campus facilities," Jones said.

The University maintains storage racks and shelters for about 1,700 bicycles, and 150,000 student trips to campus are made each year on the CSUS shuttle system.

In addition, CSUS students may ride Regional Transit buses and light rail for free, and 1,500 students use the system to get to campus on a typical school day. And about 250 CSUS employees pay $20 each year to use Regional Transit.

Growth

Late September will feature the unveiling of Joe Serna Jr. Plaza, which is sure to become a treasured campus gathering spot. Located next to the University Union, it includes the South Lawn, a tree-shaded amphitheater, a fountain and an arcade of trees.

The grand opening event for the plaza will be at 6 p.m., Wednesday, Sept. 20.

There will also be a “Celebration of LIFE” wine and food tasting fund-raiser on Thursday Sept. 7 celebrating the opening of the LIFE Center in the west wing of the University’s Julia Morgan House. The home, designed by legendary architect Julia Morgan, was meticulously renovated and is now a showcase of Morgan’s detailed approach to design. The LIFE Center offers wellness programs for seniors. Tickets are $50 and are available by calling 278-7255.

Public tours of the Julia Morgan House have been scheduled for this fall. It is also available to be reserved for weddings, banquets and other events. More information is available at 227-5527.

Grand openings promise to remain common in coming years, as CSUS grows from today’s 24,500 students to as many as 32,000 in the next decade.

Eventually, University planners envision a sweeping park-like area extending from the Esplanade off J Street all the way to the library fountain. Older, inefficient buildings in that area are being replaced by modern buildings on the campus’ outer edge. In addition, work began this summer on removing the temporary buildings from the southeast of campus near the University Union.

Among the planned new buildings are those in the planned “South Village.” Three could be completed as early as 2002.

There will be a new building for Capital Public Radio, the University-licensed public radio operation which is now located in cramped offices off campus. There will also be new quarters for Regional and Continuing Education, and an RCE and Foundation Projects building, which will house additional on-campus offices of the U.S. Geological Survey, offices for the Caltrans Water Quality offices, space for new CSUS Foundation special projects, and classrooms and labs for RCE.

Also in the works is a new parking structure on the east side of campus near the American River. It will add about 1,000 parking spaces, and will be located where temporary buildings were torn down over the summer.

Finally, a major addition to the University Library could be completed as soon as 2003.

The proposed 100,000-square foot, $23 million Academic Information Center would be connected to the south of the University Library and is envisioned as an ideal setting for the use of information technology. It would have nearly 1,000 computer stations for student use, and would consolidate the office and technical support space for computing, communications and media services.
