

October 5, 2001

To Whom It May Concern:

As a former student of David Lang, I can say that he was one of the best instructors that I have had in my college career. As an instructor he went above and beyond the duties of a professor, wanting every student to succeed in his course, other courses and life. The way he presented the concepts from course materials, which were difficult in nature, was easily understood by all. He was very encouraging with his warm and caring personality, which made it easy to ask questions. Also, if a student did not understand the ideas he demonstrated during the class he would stay and explain the information in different ways until mastered.

As a non-business major, I was dreading taking microeconomics as a class. All of my anxieties were lifted when Mr. Lang presented the first concept of microeconomics in a way that I had not seen before and that was easily understandable. This continued throughout the semester and as it went on I became more and more interested in the course and subject material. I was driven by his enthusiasm for the subject, which in turn inspired me to do my best in the class and to take further economic classes.

I have never had a teacher that cared about the students as much as he did.

Sincerely,

Becky Sommer