Wedding role will mark a dad’s ‘amazing’ recovery – thanks to Sac State grad students

When Eva Fields marries Brent Schwartz on July 7 in Sacramento, her father will walk her down the aisle, take her hand for the traditional father-daughter dance and toast the newlyweds.

It’s what fathers do – but anyone who saw Don Fields three years ago, after his devastating cerebral hemorrhage, might not have thought it possible.

“The doctors said, ‘You probably don’t want this guy to wake up,’ ” his daughter recalls. “He’s had numerous brain surgeries. He can’t swallow. He falls. He’s hard to understand. They told me if he lived, his life would be hell. What they didn’t tell me was how much fun it would be to watch him improve.”

Among the wedding guests will be a group of Sacramento State graduate students from the Physical Therapy and Speech Pathology departments, who spent months helping Don Fields prepare for this special day – and the years to come.

“It’s the difference between the quality of a life worth living, and not,” says Ginger Rutland, the bride’s mother. “My husband’s stroke was massive, and he wasn’t supposed to live. What they’ve done is nothing short of amazing.”

Eva occasionally practices the father-daughter dance with her dad, who generally uses a wheelchair or a walker to get around. She’s content to have him cling to her and sway to the song he chose for the occasion: Willie Nelson’s Don’t Let Your Babies Grow Up to Be Cowboys.

But Emily Johnson and Chelsea McCormack, the PT grad students working with him this summer, have other ideas. “By the time of the wedding, we want to get him to move in a circle,” says McCormack. “Our goal is get him safely down the aisle and dancing with his daughter.” They’re also challenging him to quietly lower himself – “and not plop,” as they say – onto the church pew. They have him practice with an armless dining chair.
Fields also plans to toast the newlyweds at the reception. He memorized his speech and has practiced it repeatedly with grad students Patti Osterholm and Hillary Vigil at Sacramento State’s Maryjane Rees Language, Speech and Hearing Center.

His speech therapy work will continue this fall at the Rees Center, which offers to the public an assortment of fee-based services performed by supervised graduate students. Eva’s attempt to get her father into Sac State’s free PT Mock Clinic came too late in the Spring 2013 semester, so the clinic’s director, Dr. Michael McKeough, emailed students, asking if anyone would work independently with Fields at his home. The family pays a small stipend to the students.

All of the student therapists -- including Casey Mokres, Elaine Gardner and Esther “Teia” Jung from Physical Therapy, and Emalee Sharp and Hayden Zenk from Speech Pathology -- are invited to the wedding.

“Emalee was Dad’s first speech therapist,” Eva says. “She got him to understand that no one could understand him and that he had interesting things to say, so that he should work at being understood.”

Before his stroke on July 28, 2010, Fields ran a successful public relations firm, pitching political agendas to the media. His wife, an associate editor at the Sacramento Bee, had just finished chemotherapy after undergoing a mastectomy. And Eva, a 2008 graduate of Reed College, had quit her job at the State Capitol to travel abroad but put her plans on hold to care for her father during his recovery.

Eva met her fiancé, a computer engineer at Intel, soon after her father’s release from the hospital. Along with the usual linens and cookware listed on their wedding gift registry, the couple offers well-wishers the opportunity to donate to Sac State’s Physical Therapy and Speech Pathology programs.

“Sacramento State has the most wonderful people in its rehabilitation programs,” Eva says. “One thing I appreciate is that they treat Dad like a human being and not a patient. I can’t believe how lucky I am. I have my daddy back. I told him I wouldn’t get engaged until he could walk me down the aisle.”
