

After Late Rains

In the garden, half-lit—
one black bee has already begun to clamber.

An orange poppy, though still balancing its wizard's hat—tall and straight—will clearly cast it off today.

By my door, the sepals of a rose bud begin to pull apart—

and aphids cluster—thick, sticky—waiting for the red flower within.

Theresa McCourt